

ABSTRACT

A process for simulating an input sequence partitions the input sequence into a set of substrings and a tail. The substrings preferably have lengths that are not all equal. An output sequence then includes the substrings in a random order.